It is known that the characteristics of devices of an integrated circuit can be modified by doping the semiconductor body containing them with dopants of the correct type and density. For example, where a p-type semiconductor is used, a particular dopant such as boron can be used to achieve a desired p-type conductivity. In general, the density of the dopants in the body may be altered by implantation, for example. To obtain optimum device performance, the dopants must be distributed in the body uniformly and without diffusion of the dopant in any direction away from the region of the body where the dopant was introduced. Further, it is known that implanted dopants may penetrate through the semiconductor body and into neighbouring layers, or even into a second body of semiconductor material.
